Excerpt from Madame Sans-Gené an Historical Romance: Founded on the Play

In the Rue de Bondy lighted lamps smoked and showed the entrance to a popular ball, the Vaux-Hall.

This ball, with its fantastic name, was directed by citizen Joly, an artist of the "Théâtre des Arts."

This was in the great days of July, 1792.

Louis XVI. still held a nominal royalty; but his head, destined to the axe since the twentieth of June, rested now uncertainly on his shoulders.

Revolution thundered in the very streets.

Robespierre, Marat, and Barbaroux, the handsome Marsellais, had held a secret conclave, in which, without being able to agree in their choice of a chief—a dictator who should stand as the "Friend of the People," they had decided to make a decisive onset on the royal family, now confined in the palace of the Tuileries as in a fortress.

Merr waited for the arrival of the Marseilles troops to give the signal for the insurrection.
